New tax on sugary drinks proposed in Australia A new tax on sugary drinks will be introduced in Australia, to help combat health concerns like obesity. Australia will introduce a "sin" tax on sugary drinks from January next year. The move was confirmed by Health Minister Greg Hunt in a media conference today. Mr Hunt said the tax would be aimed at addressing unhealthy diets and the damage done to public health, and help make sugary drinks a thing of the past. Under the new legislation, drinks with more than 8.5g of sugar per 100ml will have to be taxed at a rate of 20 per cent, compared to a current tax rate of 15 per cent. The tax will apply to drinks containing sugar added at the point of manufacture, and will apply to drinks sold at supermarkets, restaurants and bars. Speaking at the conference, Mr Hunt said sugary drinks were "the next tobacco", and they were "the new alcohol". "By introducing these tax and labelling initiatives we are showing the world the Australian way to go about changing our habits," he said. "We want to see healthy, active and long-lived Australians and that means making sure that we are helping to change people's habits." The Australian Medical Association supports the introduction of the tax and has been calling for similar moves overseas, saying they reduce consumption and could help reduce rates of chronic illnesses like diabetes and heart disease. Mr Hunt also announced new draft labelling rules for drinks today, but said that it was "premature" to talk about labelling today. The Australian Beverages Council says a tax is "punitive". "This is a tax on a whole range of consumers, it is not just on a certain type of consumer and it is one we believe will have very little impact on consumption,"
