With the new Adobe Photoshop for iPad, the drawings, graphs, and online maps you make on the computer can now be saved directly to your iPad and shared online with other Adobe Creative Cloud members, or embedded directly into web pages and documents. You can also capture screen snapshots for online gallery sharing. The app, available for $4.99 at the App Store, features a full screen view of the layers and filters used for each image, which can be moved and trimmed before or after you share them with others. One of the things I liked best about the original Photoshop app for the iPad was the ability to "crack open" a photo and remove some of the background, background elements, and people and layers from the file, creating new images and retaining the layers that are non-editable for printing. When in the app, those spots showing through remain visible, enabling you to trim them off, because they still appear in Photoshop's precise layer mask - the blue line drawing that looks like a photograph - and the layers are still intact. Those lines disappear when you share them. When you capture images with screen shots on your iPad, they can go directly into the family My Photos. But when they do, the file size will be much larger, so you might need to limit the size of your screen shot files.

As it is now in Adobe's latest Photoshop for iPad, you can rotate the captured image, transform it into a 360-degree panorama image, and make colors pop — adding the traditional Photoshop digital background and dodge, fire, and more. Finally, you can crop the image, too.
