A long time ago, there was a time where the computer was just a tool that allowed a designer to create design scrapbooking layouts. With the addition of Photoshop, designers could create more intricate elements and media that could be used across the entire company making the word graphic designer the term we are now. Since then, Photoshop has evolved to be a giant tool that, when used properly, allows designers to protect, curate, edit, and create for themselves. The level of sophistication and complexity in the brand graphic designers world has increased so much the last few years that I am absolutely blown away by the level of projects and content that we see week in week out. I am quite sure a significant portion of the power we have today is thanks to Photoshop. I was working in a team with a client, and we were solving her challenge, her image was in a place where we were spending too much time editing the image. We were fighting over what to use, what in extreme transparency, what is a UI element, etc. Eventually, she told me to download Photoshop. From that point on, nothing has been the same. The fact is: we are in the age of perfection. Pretty much every pixel of every element of the website has to be perfect. We were editing images to add a subtle "glow" and "bloom" effect, and that is not perfect. It is very simple to do, however, for a huge percentage of the population is color blind (which by the way, is the majority). The idea of running software as complex as Photoshop directly in the browser would have been hard to imagine just a few years ago. However, by using various new web technologies, Adobe has now brought a public beta of Photoshop to the web. What's next? We believe that Photoshop what is next is the next chapter of web computing. The web community has always embraced open standards and WebAssembly has provided us with the flexibility and speed to bring multi-platform functionality into the browser. Now we can layer on top of that the art and creativity that Photoshop is known for. With Photoshop, creatively minded individuals are now able to bring their unique sensibilities into the digital realm. Ultimately, there's no better platform for them to create, edit, and experiment with than the Web. e3d0a04c9c
